Research Activity

"Writing Lifes of Teens" (On-Going).

By continuing to examine how youth think about and use writing for their own purposes and on their own time, the possibility exists for researchers to help teachers both understand and create conditions in which young writers can flourish. Thus, in an effort to understand the perspectives of youth about their own writing habits, influences, purposes, and preferences, six researchers from North Carolina, Oregon, Texas, Florida, and Kentucky have joined together to collect observational, interview, and artifactual data from over 150 middle and high school students in the year-long Writing Lives of Teens Project. Participants' diverse settings include rural, suburban, and urban contexts and within those, summer programs, after school programs, alternative schools, and regular classrooms.
